

So you think destiny brought you together?

Seal the deal with a destination wedding.

“Destination weddings are becoming increasingly popular as couples seek to exchange their vows in non-traditional ways,” says Monica Contrisciano of Doorways, Ltd., a Bryn Mawr company specializing in villa vacations in Italy, France, Spain and the Caribbean, where she has assisted and arranged several weddings.

“Certain celebrities and movie stars have made destination weddings very popular, which has only fueled the desire for everyday couples to have them, too” says Kit Burns, also of Doorways. “Destination weddings are also a way for couples to avoid or buck tradition. Sometimes couples choose to have a destination wedding because they may not be active members of a particular church or synagogue, so they might feel uncomfortable having their wedding there. Destination weddings have become an ideal way to keep the guest list small, and to spend time and money with people you really want to be with. And let’s face it—it’s exciting and exotic.”
